MANUSCRIPT DETAILS

TITLE: Edutocracy: A model of the new West Indian plantocracy

ABSTRACT: This work draws on a combination of three theories, dependency (a theory of economics), the inner plantation theory as a socio-psychological construct and plantation pedagogy (an education theory) to develop its own educational theory called edutocracy, as a partial explanation of the failure of the West Indian education system. It employs document analysis as its primary method of data collection and analysis in producing major themes for discussion. The work culminates in the construction of an illustrative depiction of a model of edutocracy. It finds that the current West Indian debate surrounding educational reform of the Secondary School Entrance Exam will, like most other previous reforms, net very little meaningful change if legislators and educators continue to negate the impact of the socio-historical context on education in this region, specifically the deleterious colonial ideologies which shaped and continues to shape education for the Afro-West Indian with the interests of the Euro-American metropole as paramount.

APPROACHES: Qualitative

METHODS: Document analysis, Discussions

REGION(S) OF FOCUS: Anglophone Caribbean
